An Inside Look at the Health Care Real Estate Industry
by Lois Thomson

To a greater extent than ever before, the health care industry seems to be closely linked to the real estate industry, and nowhere more so than in South Florida. South Florida Hospital News recently talked with four major leaders who are involved in the health care aspect of realty, and learned their thoughts on trends, changes, and challenges in this hot-topic area.

Fred Abbo, with more than 30 years of experience, is one of the largest private developers in Florida. He is the founder of The Abbo Group of Companies, which comprises more than 100 companies.

Charles Michelson is a principal in Saltz Michelson Architects, an architectural firm founded 30 years ago that, in part, provides architectural services to the medical community.

Bruce Rendina, who has 20 years of experience in health care real estate, founded Rendina Companies in 1998. Its core business is the design, development, financing, leasing and management of medical office real estate.
